This book did not turn out to be what I had expected. It is filled with stories from Howard Hill's life but not specifically about hunting and archery. Most of the book covers Howard's exploits as he attempts to photograph and film wild animals across North America in the 20's and 30's. While reading the book I came to realize that in the days before "extreme sports" there were people who would pursue activities that most rational people would dismiss as very dangerous if not suicidal. This book is full of these stories and an entertaining read.

This was a great find and some wonderful history of the travels of Howard Hill. Loved adventures like this and the way it was written by the Mr. Hill. Nice collection for my small library regarding archery. A great find and fun to go back during those days. Special chapter, I found interesting, even though it's outdated now is the pages dedicated to the photography equipment Mr. Hill used. Many chapters here I stepped back in time and enjoyed. Howard Hill is a legend and a special bowman who made a positive statement with his skills long before the compound bow of today. This should be a must read for anyone interested in archery.

While Howard Hill is arguably the greatest bowhunter/archer of the 20th Century, this book has much more about his filming of animals in the wild. It is a nostalgic look back to a different time, and hunters that are also photo enthusiasts will enjoy the book, but don't expect a lot of bowhunting stories.
