The Zend Avesta, Part 3 Of 3: The Yasna, Visparad, Afrinagan, Gahs And Miscellaneous Fragments (Forgotten Books)

Synopsis

This is part III of the Sacred Books of the East Zend Avesta, translated by L.H. Mills, who took up the task after James Darmesteter, the translator of the first two parts. It includes liturgical material, some of which is almost completely unchanged from the earliest period of Zoroastrianism, and still in use today. Of great interest are some of the oldest formulations of dualism, which later became a core concept of other middle eastern religions, including Judaism, and later Christianity. Moreover, the texts in this part of the Avesta are not so far removed from Vedic-era Hinduism, and as such represent a link between the later great Eastern and Western religions. In this last part of the "The Zend Avesta" books, there is a detail explanations by the translator about the hymns which helps with the understanding of the book but at the same time sometimes it creates confusion. The hymns are written to the gods and the supreme god Ahura Mazda. Zarathustra has a big significance and duality takes tremendous importance in this book. Many praises to different gods and the nature are recited and advices are given to the believers. It is a very important book and different than the other two. I learned a lot from it. I recommend it strongly. You have to read all three of the books to make sense of the religion as a whole. The first book is the laws, the second book is the prayers to the gods and praises. This third one is more praises and prayers and some philosophy. Good deed, good thought and good word.

Amazing book, a rare one, I will buy more books of this edition. Why we have to write that much?
