Ten Amazing Jews: They Thought for Themselves, edited and annotated by Sid Roth, tells the story of 10 Jewish souls who were spiritually lost until they found messianic Judaism. There is no mistaking the fact that the book is a missionary tool, used by Roth, to encourage Jews everywhere to embrace Christianity. When reading the vignettes, it is clear that the various authors are quite sincere in their beliefs. On the one hand, it is a comfort to know that they have reached new levels of personal, spiritual realization with their decision. On the other hand--as a Jew--it is profoundly sad for me that the authors failed to find salvation in their own backyard, so to speak, and chose to break away from mainstream Judaism. Just so you know, I did not purchase this book through .com. It arrived at my door, unsolicited, wrapped in white plastic. Upon opening the package, I looked at the cover and immediately knew what I had received. The dreamy, treelined autumn scene with an ambiguous figure walking toward a gauzy light and the title simply gave it away. In spite of the deliberately ambiguous blurb on the back and the fact that I had never heard of Sid Roth, I intuitively knew where this was headed. Instead of placing the book in the circular file, I decided to read it and post a review on . My goal here is to simply give a Jewish perspective on this book. Why should an observant Jew review a book about messianic Judaism? Precisely because I am the target audience. If the book is supposed to be convincing, it should have convinced me. It did not. As you will see, this has little to do with the sincerity of the authors and more with fundamental differences in the way the authors and this reader view both Judaism and scripture.
